ROY W. HOWARD COLLEGIATE REPORTING AWARD

The prize trip will combine journalism education with opportunities to learn about the history, culture and modern life in Japan and South Korea. Roy W. Howard scholar Bradley J. Hamm, dean of the Indiana University School of Journalism and an authority on Asian media, will lead the trip.

Nine winners will travel to Seoul, where they'll meet Korea's leading journalists, visit the Presseum – Korea's first newspaper museum – and see the latest in technology at Samsung. Then it's off to Tokyo and its amazing electronics district, Akihabara. Next, it's a trip to the classic Japanese city Kyoto on the bullet train by way of Mt. Fuji and 1,000-year-old shrines. Along the way, there will be visits to leading media outlets and meetings with Japanese business, education and media leaders.

Meet the 2008
winners and view

FAQs About The Man & The Prize

So, who was Roy W. Howard?

He led United Press International and Scripps Howard Newspapers during a journalism career that spanned nearly six decades. He was so revered by fellow journalists that in 1955, at age 72, the Society of Professional Journalists named him honorary president. At the time of his death in 1964, then U.S. president Lyndon B. Johnson said he was “already a legend in his profession” and predicted he would be remembered in history as one of journalism’s commanding figures.

Why the international collegiate reporting award in his honor?

Roy Howard lived a global life well before most journalism schools taught about international reporting. He traveled and worked in Asia, and had a great affinity for Japan, Korea and China. Howard corresponded with presidents about U.S. policy in Asia, and records at the presidential libraries show that they took his insight seriously.

Why is the prize an international study experience?

An international study perspective is essential for journalists who cover politics, business, war, immigration issues and their own diverse communities. We have in Bradley J. Hamm, dean of the journalism school at Indiana University, a uniquely qualified leader for this trip. He is not only a gifted instructor, but also a Roy W. Howard scholar who has extensive travel experience throughout Asia.

Why the trip to Japan and South Korea? Few American journalism students today have any experience in Asia. Even for the nearly 200,000 American students who study abroad each year, only about seven percent select a country in Asia. Meanwhile, Japan has the largest circulation newspapers in the world. In South Korea and Japan, a new media world is emerging with incredible technology.

This is an expenses-paid trip, right? What are my responsibilities? Your travel, lodging and meal expenses will be covered, as well as the costs associated with tours, certain activities and performances. You will be required to sign a waiver of liability and have the required travel documents (i.e. passport, which must be obtained prior to the trip). A winner unable to make the trip will forfeit any and all prizes associated with the competition, and the award will be presented to the next runner-up.
